What is a beaver's diet?

Beavers are among the largest of rodents. They are herbivores and prefer to eat leaves, bark, twigs, roots, and aquatic plants.

What Does a Beaver Eat?

Anything plant-based is potential beaver food. These clever engineering animals eat the bark right off trees they fell for building dams and lodges, along with twigs, buds and leaves. They also eat roots, grasses and aquatic plants, and in captivity they even eat leafy greens and mixed vegetables.

What Does a Beaver Eat?

Some animal species strictly consume plant matter, some are big meat eaters and others dine on a healthy mix of both. Beavers are a prime example of those that eat vegetation only, the herbivores. Beavers are large rodents that definitely enjoy vegetation -- including twigs, foliage, bark and aquatic plants.

RELATED QUESTIONS

Are beavers friendly?

Beavers have been known to be extremely aggressive in defending their territory against perceived encroachment. They may attack humans when infected by rabies, and "can also become disoriented during the daytime and attack out of fear". ... Beaver attacks can also be fatal for domestic animals.

Why Beavers are the best?

Beaver ponds create wetlands which are among the most biologically productive ecosystems in the world (1). They increase plant, bird (2) and wildlife variety (3), improve water quality (4), and raise salmon and trout populations (5). This one species supports thousands of species.

Do beavers live on land or water?

Though they are cousins to mice and squirrels, beavers are North America's largest rodents, typically weighing 50 or more pounds. Somewhat awkward on land, they are adapted for living mostly in water. Their bulky bodies are designed to keep them warm in cold water.
